Unpaid Work Won't Fly!

We would like to thank all of our members for their time, energy and enthusiasm during last week's education picket and rally against unpaid work. CUPE Air Transat is in bargaining with their employer, we hope this will provide them with the strength and resolve to tackle this important issue. We also thank all members for dropping by the office to pick up baggage tags over the past week to show your support and solidarity for this important initiative.

Our Air Canada CUPE Collective Agreement expires in April

2025. Until then, we are unable to engage in open work action, including work to rule or strike. While job action seeks to express dissatisfaction through the disruption, slow down or complete stoppage of work in the workplace, events like our rally seek to engage, educate and motivate our members and the public without operational disruption to the employer. The best thing we can do right now is support our other airline colleagues in bargaining and educate ourselves and the public about the important challenges we are facing to build strength, solidarity and support to prepare for 2025. It is not yet the time for action on board, in the airport or on social media. Inciting each other to do things that are contrary to Air Canada's policies, procedures or operational norms is not productive or useful at this time. We are seeing uptick in the number of members being taken to task for incendiary comments made on social media in this regard. While the enthusiasm and engagement is a beautiful thing to behold, we don't want you to risk your employment engaging in work action activities that are not yet legal. Getting fair pay for our time at work will be a longer term project for us, so save some of that enthusiasm, we will be needing it!
